

A Dialogue on the Actual State of Parliament (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A Dialogue on the Actual State of Parliament Two gentlemen, one of whom I took to be a foreigner by his dress and accent, though he understood English perfectly, the other, as I found out afterwards, a member of parliament, came into a coffee-house not far from the Exchange; and, placing themselves in the next box to me, began by talking over the sights they had been visiting; and then fell into a conversation upon the British Government, which I thought so curious, that when I came home, I endeavoured to recollect it, and to throw the substance of it upon paper.
