Not illustrated. 1824 Excerpt: ...then the last of my race, A wanderer forlorn where my fathers have been! But Sympathy opened the door of her shed, And welcomd me in--twas a welcome of pain; With a sigh I reclind on the pillow my head, And rose with the daylight to sorrow again. THE FLOWR OF THE SCENE. Though fair are the maids on the Gyle, sweetest river, And oft with their loveliness rapturd Ive been, Yet the fairest and dearest, denied me for ever, Is Mary the rose-bud, the flowr of the scene. Were I lord of the plains of her own native valley, And chief of yon hills that romanticy shine, All these Id relinquish, unthought of and gaily, If the gentle, the modest, sweet Mary were mine! Farewell! in the pride of thy youth and thy glory! O! long may thy beauty smile freshly and green! And for ages to come be the theme of my story, Mary, the rose-bud, the flowr of the scene! But Beautys but skin-deep, a lure to the lover, A blossom that blooms, and then withers again; Once faded her tresses, no charm can recover, While the blushes of virtue forever remain! CLARE-INCH. Erewhile the sunbeams wandring light Had left the warriors grave, And dawnd the twinkling gems of night, Down on the dark blue wave; A voice was heard from Clare-Inch Isle, All lonely on the deep; The rowers pausd, and wept the while, And pausd again to weep. Yes! in yon clouds the visions rise, Prophetic of your doom; Wove in the texture of the skies, The years of fate to come. Yes! Ruin marches in your Hall, No more your banners wave;--And where was heard the hunters call, Is hardly known his grave. Your warrior Chiefs forever fled, All desolate your plains; And where was seen the Eagle spread, The sable Raven reigns! Dark is the signal on the hill,

That lighted to the rout; And cea...
