Not illustrated. 1884 Excerpt: ... SPEECH OF HON. RICHARD COKE, OF TEXAS, In The Senate Op The United States, Wednesday, January 21, 1885. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 5-1(31)) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce--Mr. COKE said: Mr. President: I have not participated in the debate upon the subject of interstate commerce now before the Senate up to this time for the reason that the House bill, it was known, would after a while become the subject of discussion, and my opinion of the Senate bill is and has been that it is a measure of no practical value, and that any amendment in accord with its theory would fail to give it anything of usefulness or merit. The House bill is one which I hope will be examined thoroughly by the Senate. It is a conservative measure.. It is thoroughly well considered. It is the product of a debate and discussion in the press, in the two Houses of Congress, and among the people often years standing, and it represents in its principles and policy the popular will on this great question. This bill provides that freight and passenger in interstate railroad transportation rates shall be reasonable. It prohibits all discrimination in freight rates between individuals. As an adjunct to that proposition it prohibits rebates and drawbacks. It prohibits pooling and thereby promotes competition. It prohibits discrimination in freight rates between localities by forbidding a greater charge for a short haul than for a longer haul. Lastly, it requires the posting up of schedules of the rates of freight charges, and announces a penalty for charging more or less than the posted rates. These are the great, leading, salient points of the House bill. I appeal to Senators to ...
