

For a Railway Commission: Speech of Hon. Geo; W. Tyler, Senator from Bell, in the Senate of Texas, February 28, 1889 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from For a Railway Commission: Speech of Hon. Geo; W. Tyler, Senator From Bell, in the Senate of Texas, February 28, 1889 Is it not within the memory of Senators upon this oor when every little town of five hundred or a thousand inhabi tants had its shoemaker. Its hatmaker, its tailor, and all of these various pursuits were followed by individual citizens of the community? Such used to be the condition of things throughout the whole country. Have you considered that the occupations of our people are gradually being absorbed by corporate enterprises The old fellow who used to make boots when you were a boy is now a shoemaker in some great boot and shoe factory, working for five or six dollars a week. The man who used to make our hats is employed as a journeyman in some great hat manufactory in Philadelphia or New York. All of these avocations and occupations have been swallowed up by the aggregation of corporate capital. It is true that with great aggregations of capital and a great num ber of workmen these articles are made cheaper than they used to be. I am not speaking against this policy, but merely to remind you, fellow Senators, that the laws of trade and commerce have assumed a different condition to that of fifty years ago. They demand a different principle of adjustment, and the application of different laws and a different treatment at our hands, and we should open our eyes to 1722s country and this age instead of looking into the musty law books of England for the laws governing a former age. Professor Had ley also says: Until about 1850 it was assumed that railroad business was subject to the same laws as any other business, and in particular to the so-called law of competition, by whose free action rates would be brought down to the cost of service. It was gradually seen that this assumption was not strictly true; that in many instances it was very far from
