Excerpt: ... had been used to convey grists to be ground, and who had been greatly oppressed and nearly heart-broken by not being served in turn, could have appreciated so highly this species of public utility. CHAPTER X. OF INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY. Property may be physical and tangible, as land and chattels; or it may be intellectual and ideal, as the immediate offspring of the intellect and sentiments, existing in thought or embodied in language. In the infancy of a State, the idea of property is limited to physical possessions, and the laws, do not recognize those things as the subjects of this right which come of a higher civilization. The savage is contented if his canoe, his cabin and his scanty store of provisions are secure from depredation--these are all that he hath, and their protection is all that he can require. The civilized man can ask no more than this--that all he hath shall be protected; but he can demand so much of right. Now, as civilization advances, not only do the subjects of corporeal possession, the objects of material property, increase to infinite variety, but incorporeal rights originate and are acknowledged by every civilized State. In a rude state of society, while the person and tangible property may be protected by the laws, the character and delicate moral interests are left for individual defence and vindication. But in a more advanced stage of society, the character, domestic affections, and the moral sensibilities of mankind, demand and receive a measure of protection from the State. These are incorporeal rights, existing in idea, and are wholly devoid of that tangibility and capacity of possession, which a rude conception of rights ascribes to every thing which is to be made the subject of legal protection. Property may be incor...
