Little Mary; or Talks and Tales For Children. with 6 illustrations. MARY LEARNING TO READ. MARY was a little girl five years old. She knew her letters, and could call them by their right names as soon as she saw them all excepting b and d. These puzzled her. When she was reading, she would say: bno, dno, b. Once she spelled in this way: dbab, bad. Her mamma took a great deal of pains to teach her to read. Sometimes Mary was a patient scholar, and sometimes she was not. When she was patient and attentive, she enjoyed it; and when she was impatient, and kept thinking about her play instead of her book, she thought it very dull work. Her fore-finger, with which she tried to point, had then no stiffness in it. It would keep slipping about, all over the page, and made witch-work with her reading. When she was very small, before she was four years old, her mamma had bought her a box of very pretty cards with letters on them. There were letters on one side and pictures on the other. Her mamma spread them on the carpet, all in a line, and showed Mary which was the top of the letter, and which was the bottom. She showed the little girl a great many times, and then she told her that she must place them. At first, Mary thought it pretty fun, and went to work with great glee; but soon she grew tired. A, somehow or other, was always standing on his head, and P would pitch over on his side, and D would lie on his back. Mary lost her patience, and she left her pretty cards and went and crept under the sofa. Her mamma did not take any notice of her, but looked down on her sewing. Pretty soon, Mary popped out her head. Mamma, said she, mamma, I wish I could go out and buy a block thing, that would pick them up itself. Her mother told her she could not buy anything which would do the learning for her. You must learn them all for yourself, Mary, said she, one letter at a time. You must be a patient little girl, if you want to know how to read. Then Mary crept out, and she put A on his feet, and stood P up, and turned D over, and she was patient, and she persevered, and she soon learned her letters ; and when she was five years old, as I have told you, she could read very easy words, without spelling ; only the little b and d troubled her still.
