

The Journey From Heaven

What if the angels feel our pain? What if the rules of our existence don't allow them to intervene? In the desert, a hostile army approaches a refugee camp. The sick can't be moved, and one doctor refuses to leave. But Naseena, the youngest aid worker, also refuses to despair. In a playgroup on the other side of the world, on an ordinary morning, a child feels the first stirrings of terminal illness. Little Megan still plays with an imaginary friend but what good could he possibly do? This is an adult fantasy novel about serendipity and the limits of perception. Imagine, for the next 79,848 words or so, that there's more to coincidence than chance. Imagine that you're not alone, and that some things really are meant to be. William Essex is a writer about innovation and change. He occasionally finds himself getting up early enough to catch the dawn and write about everything else as well. Passages from The Journey from Heaven have been read aloud at festivals and gatherings, in hospices and homes, and in places where they sing. You can find William Essex at www.williamessex.com. He's also part of Climbing Tree Books, which is a publishing company run as a collective by a group of writers keen to escape their own typecasting. Find out more at www.climbingtreebooks.com.
