

Pelle the Conqueror Volume 02

Excerpt: ...get to see the world! He could not sit quiet. The next morning they came rioting into the workshop, filling the place with their deafening gabble. Soles and heels! Heels that wont come off! A bit of heel-work and two on the snout! So they went on, bringing great armfuls of boots from under their cloaks, or fishing them out of bottomless pockets, and throwing them in heaps on the window-bench, each with his droll remarks. Boots and shoes they called understandings; they turned and twisted every word, tossing it like a ball from mouth to mouth, until not a trace of sense was left in it. The apprentices forgot everything, and could scarcely contain themselves for laughing, and the young master overflowed with wit- he was equal to the best of them. Now one saw that he really might have luck with the women: there was no boasting or lying about it. The young actress with the hair like the lightest flax could not keep her eyes off him, although she evidently had all the others at her petticoat-tails; she made signs to her companions that they should admire the masters splendid big mustache. The master had forgotten his lame leg and thrown his stick away; he was on his knees, taking the actresss measure for a pair of high boots with patent tops and concertina-like folds in the legs. She had a hole in the heel of her stocking, but she only laughed over it; one of the actors cried Poached egg! and then they laughed uproariously. Old Jeppe came tumbling into the room, attracted by the merriment. The blonde lady called him Grandfather, and wanted to dance with him, and Jeppe forgot his dignity and laughed with the rest. Yes, its to us they come when they want to have something good, he said proudly. And I learned my trade in Copenhagen, and I used to carry boots and shoes to more than one play-actor there. We had to work for the whole theater; Jungfer Patges, who became so famous later on, got her first dancing shoes from us. Yes, those...
