Not illustrated. 1888 Excerpt: ... but he speaks very little of any of his five daughters, and after he has recorded the birth of the first two he lets the rest alone. Marie de Gournay then came into his life with the force of one who fills a vacant place; and he loved her as he had loved La Boetie, wearing her on his heart with just that difference we have spoken of above. Her enthusiasm for him was even more unbounded than his for her, great as his was. But she had youth on her side; and the reverence which appreciative youth gives to the confessed superiority of a grander mind and to an older person, helped to lift her love into a more passionate sphere than his could bear. And as she had lived through a girls sorrow and loved to her hearts hurt, she was all the freer to bestow such affection on her intellectual father and literary demigod, as has linked their names together for all time. Her love for him, and his for her, were of higher honor to him than that election to the office of maire of Bordeaux, that ribbon of the order of Saint-Michel, that recognition even of kings and the trust that Henri of Navarre had in him, all of which had been of so much pleasant pride to him. She, on her side, owes, as we have said, her reputation to her association with Montaigne. As an authoress on her own account she might have gained a local and temporary fame, but one for all time--assuredly not. One of the most interesting of all the material things connected with Montaignes life is the round library, with its three windows, giving trois veues de riche et libre prospect, where he sat and possessed his soul in peace. Cest la mon siege, he says; ie essaye a men rendre la domination pure, et sy soustraire a la communaute et coniugale et
