

The Other House

The plot is simple enough... two houses, apparently back to back, in Wilverley, a small English village, set the scene. One contains a widow, the other a young married couple. The young wife widows the young husband, and he becomes Wilverleys most eligible bachelor, except for the fact that he promised his dying wife that he would never marry again, at least not during the life of his child. So somebody has to kill the child, right? Enter Jamess genius for a character. Theres Paul, the huge, infinitely imperturbable son of the wealthy Mrs. Beever; the diminutive and impetuous Dennis Vidal; Tony Bream himself, a remarkably good-natured but insensitive fool; and the powerful Mrs. Beever, whose awful determination cows every one else before her. Like Jamess best writing, his characters become interesting on their own; his fictions become an opportunity to satisfy curiosity. I think thats what makes this book a page-turner; the characters are interesting enough that I want to know whats going to happen. In the end, I suppose, what makes this book succeed is what would have made the dramatic version fail: Jamess endless fascination with the workings of the human mind must have become either painfully boring or just incomprehensible to a theatrical audience. However it came about, I recommend it unequivocally.
