

The Constitutional Criterion (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Constitutional Criterion Does this criterion consist in the observance of precedent and usage, - of judicial authorities, of the forms of our government? in the acts of the legislature? Do precedent, usage, and authority themselves require a criterion to determine their character? Can the forms of our government be unconstitutionally employed? Can the acts of the legislature be unconstitutional? These are questions of moment, and deserve consideration. Sect. II. On the ground of precedent, it becomes, I think, every man to tread with decency, but not authority, with a blind submission. In questions of private right, precedents are law. The observance of them is universal, and therefore, substantial justice; the public faith is pledged for it, the public credit depends upon it. They compose the common medium of civil intercourse, and mould, like our coin, be preserved religiously from alteration or diminution.
