

The sunset trail,

A story of Bat Masterson in the old west, written in the day by his friend, Alfred Henry Lewis. The narrative stars such well known names as Wild Bill Hickok, the Earp brothers - Virgil, Wyatt and Morgan - and Doc Holiday. They all enliven the history of the legendary town of Dodge. His baptismal name was William Barclay, but he was known throughout that wide-flung region lying between the Platte and the Rio Grande, the Missouri and the Mountains, as Bat. This honor fell to the boyish share of Mr. Masterson because his quick eye, steady hand, and stealthy foot rendered him invincible against bears and buffaloes. Gray oldsters of the plains were thereby reminded of one Batiste Brown who had been a celebrated hunter. Mr. Masterson's spurs were of wrought steel traced with gold, the handkerchief an arterial red for hue knotted about his brown throat was silk, not cotton, while his gray sombrero had been enriched with a bullion band of braided gold and silver, made in the likeness of a rattlesnake, fanged and ruby-eyed. This embellishment cost Mr. Masterson the price of one hundred buffalo robes, and existed a source of wondering admiration from Dodge to the Pueblos.
