It is beautiful to see how the canopied sepulchre and grassy grave both point to the same quarter, as testifying hope in the same resurrection, through the power of Him, whose name is The East. Hierologus. The Sepulchral Monuments of the middle ages seldom fail to excite a deep and solemn interest, being generally designed in admirable keeping with the architecture of the sacred structures in which they are enshrined. The king, the bishop, the noble, and the knight, are always represented in their proper costumes, extended upon their silent tombs in an attitude expressive of humility and resignation, as if awaiting the coming of their Lord: the hands of these recumbent effigies are most commonly joined in prayer, their heads being frequently supported by little figures of angels, that add considerably to their religious character. Such memorials are well worthy of imitation, and in every THE SEPULCHRAL MONUMENTS. Ill respect superior to modern monuments, which are not only devoid of all the peculiar and eloquent symbols of Christianity, but with their overwrought conceits and allegorical groups, are full of the vain pomp and glory of the world; they ought not therefore to be admitted within the hallowed precincts of edifices consecrated to the holy services of the Church. Sepulchral Brasses were introduced about the middle of the thirteenth century, and are amongst the most interesting and beautiful works of mediaeval art: they might generally be revived with advantage, since they form a part of the pavement of the building, and do not therefore in any way interfere with the convenient arrangement of the pews and other Ecclesiastical furniture: the slabs in which they are imbedded are often surrounded by marginal legends,...
